NATURAL CONVECTION I n Chapters 7 and 8, we considered heat transfer by forced convection, where a fluid was forced to move over a surface or in a tube by external means such as a pump or a fan. In this chapter, we consider natural con- vection, where any fluid motion occurs by natural means such as buoyancy. The fluid motion in forced convection is quite noticeable, since a fan or a

Heat Conduction When heat transfers from one object to another, this is called conduction. Some materials conduct heat better than others. Metal, for example, is a good conductor of heat. We use metal in pots and pans to cook because it will move the heat from the flame to our food quickly. Cloth, like a blanket, isn't a good conductor of heat.

Heat It's as Easy as ONE TWO THREE

Heat energy actually radiates out in all directions from the energy source, such as radiated heat from a fire moving up to cook a marshmallow held above it. Any object that has more heat energy than another radiates heat to the cooler object. This is the reason a room heats up quickly when it is filled with hot student bodies.
